Meet Michael Khanddelwal

At the Muse Writers Center, he elaborates, "The weather out there was perfect every day, but I missed seeing that one red leaf fall to the ground." He, alongside a friend from USC, looked at houses in Hampton and at the beach, but ultimately knew he wanted to live in Ghent. "I was (and still is) the thriving arts area for all of Hampton Roads. I look at Ghent as the central hub for creativity in Norfolk," Michael says. When he found a house on Princess Anne Road, he knew it was a perfect fit. He's been on the same street ever since.

Soon after his return to the East Coast, Michael started teaching a poetry workshop at the Ghost Studios of Fine Art (SOFA). When SOFA closed their doors a few years later, The Muse was born, "Mostly out of necessity," Michael admits. "I wanted to do fiction, another student (Lisa Hart) wanted to do memoir, so we did." The two joined forces and The Muse Writers Center was born.

It's been ten years since Michael and Lisa solidified their plans for The Muse by drawing its logo on a napkin. The Muse has grown exponentially, both in students and now, with the opening of a new facility, in space. "We were casually looking at expanding for about three years," Michael shares. "We got to know Richard Levin (owner of the 22nd Street development) when the space opened up. He called us." Located next to Plaza del Sol on 22nd and Colonial, the expansive location boasts five large classrooms, two semi-private rooms for writers who need a little more quiet, an office, kitchen, library and auditorium. Michael's hope is the new space will further invigorate the "exploding arts scene" in Ghent. "We're here to provide encouragement for writers at all levels. With weekday happy hours, frequent events and over 70 classes, it's no wonder that Michael considers The Muse writers a large family."

When he isn't at The Muse, Michael enjoys spending time with his girlfriend, Stephanie, and enjoying all that Ghent has to offer. "I love that everything you could want to do is within walking distance of our homes," says Michael. "The Naro is here. The Muse is here. Great restaurants are here." Whether you're talking to Michael about USC football or a songwriting class, he exudes a palpable passion for Ghent that such passion exists just down the street.
